Foreword

The Isle of Skye has attracted geologists since the beginning of the Nineteenth Century. Within this comparatively small area many of the major geological units of Scotland are found. In this guide we have attempted to describe the geological history of the island. The accompanying excursions allow many of the important field relationships to be observed directly. In a few instances, however, supplementary information is provided in order that interpretations can be presented. In following the excursions additional observations will doubtless be made. We hope, therefore, that the guide will stimulate new interest in this classic area.

Acknowledgements

During the production of this guide two organisations have been most generous with facilities and funding. Britoil plc. provided cartographic facilities through Aileen Clark and Michael Cairns. The high quality of the maps and diagrams in this guide is the result of their skills. The Scottish Development Agency provided funds in order that the excursions to the guide could be prepared. This contribution allowed us to include more detailed information which we believe substantially improves the text. Dr Jain Allison of the University of Strathclyde gave much valuable information on the publishing of the guide, as well as advice on aspects of structural geology incorporated in the text. Dr John Hudson of the University of Leicester reviewed the section on the Mesozoic sedimentary rocks and helped with the stratigraphic sections within the excursions. On Skye, Mr David Lloyd of Broadford most generously made available to us his cottage and provided logistic support during our fieldwork. We thank the University of Strathclyde for the academic environment which enabled this guide to be written and for the use of its facilities to carry out the work involved. Finally, our thanks go to all who gave permission to reproduce maps and diagrams: their important contribution to the guide is acknowledged in the appropriate places in the text. Grid References in the text and on maps are from the Ordnance Survey and are reproduced by permission of the Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office.
